THE END

Snow was falling heavily outside of Elmer Fudd's house one day as he hurried to answer a knock on his door.

"What's this?" he gasped with surprise. "Somebody has left a baby basket on my doorstep, and inside it is a . . . a duck!"

"Da-da, goo-goo," the duck quacked in muffled tones, looking up at Elmer with big, innocent eyes. "Baby hungry."

"My gwacious, it can talk already," Elmer exclaimed with astonishment as he carried the basket into the house. "You poor little wascal," he clucked. "Are you all alone and hungwy in this cold, cold, world?"

"You said it, Clyde . . . oops . . . I mean, da-da," the duck replied coyly.

"Somehow your voice sounds familiar," Elmer frowned. "Well, no matter. I'll warm up some milk for you, you poor thing."

The duck shook its head vigorously.

"No? You don't want milk?" Elmer asked. "Well, what do you want then?"

"Da-da, goo-goo, steak," the duck answered in a babyish voice.

"I don't think baby ducks are supposed to eat steak," Elmer replied doubtfully. "I'd better go into the libwary and get my medical book. Maybe it'll tell me what I'm supposed to feed you."

When Elmer left the room, the duck leaped from the baby basket and sped into the kitchen. "Congratulations, Daffy, old boy," he giggled to himself. "This was almost too easy. I was afraid Elmer might not fall for that abandoned-baby routine again. But now that he has, I won't have to hunt for my own food for a while. I'll mooch enough from him to last several days."

Daffy quickly loaded his arms up with food and dashed back to his basket.

When Elmer returned to the room, Daffy hid the food he hadn't already eaten under his blankets.

"It doesn't say anything about you eating steak in my medical book," Elmer said. "I'll go and get you some milk."

Daffy finished the rest of his food the moment Elmer turned his back and snickered contentedly to himself. "That Clyde sure is a clod," he tittered. "I'll bet he doesn't even notice the food missing from his icebox. Why should I spend all day hunting, when I can get food from Baldy for free? He's . . ."

Daffy gasped with fright as he suddenly became aware that Elmer was standing nearby with a shotgun in his hands. "Er, baby hungry," he said lamely.

"Vewy funny!" Elmer said with a smile. "Now you can pay for your dinner by marching out to the yard and chopping wood for my fireplace."

Many hours later, Daffy finished chopping a huge pile of wood.

"I've paid for my dinner ten times over," he complained. "How come you had such a big pile of wood for me to chop?"

"I won't have to cut any more wood all winter," Elmer laughed. "I knew you'd be awound sooner or later and twy to play that old baby twick on me. I twicked you with your own twap by letting you think you were getting away with it so I could get this wood chopped."

"You win," Daffy grinned. "And just to prove there are no hard feelings, come on into the house, and I'll cook us a nice supper."

"Oh, me," Elmer sighed. "He's inviting me into my own house to eat my own food, but I guess he's earned another meal, at that."
